

Mark joined Hanson and Doremus Investment Management in 2023 and is responsible for investment research, portfolio management, and client relationships.

Prior to joining Hanson+Doremus, Mark spent six years at The Federal Reserve Bank of New York where he briefed policy makers on financial market developments and was responsible for analysis and trading related to the Fed's mortgage-backed securities purchase programs. Mark also co-led analytical coverage of global sustainable debt markets, authoring in-depth analysis and primers on green and social bonds as well as moderating roundtables with industry leaders on net zero carbon commitments, climate change and the housing market, and ESG (Environmental, Social, Governance) investing.

Mark holds a BA in Spanish literature and Russian from Bates College, an MBA from the Tuck School of Business at Dartmouth, and an MA in international economics and finance from the Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies (SAIS). Before graduate school, Mark worked for four years outside the U.S. for different organizations, including a malaria control NGO in Equatorial Guinea, a development finance institution in Ukraine, a bank in Bolivia, and a summer camp in Russia. He has also spent semesters studying at universities in Italy and Argentina. Mark lives in Randolph, Vermont with his wife and two daughters and enjoys skiing, hiking, reading, and Roadhouse radio on KEXP.
